It is quite difficult to make a "one-size-fits-all" argument in terms of how much of a deficit levy a country should impose, said outgoing World Bank chief economist Robert Zoellick in an interview with Fairfax Media. While it may have made sense in the past to tax poor countries more, it is no longer justifiable, he said. "There is a big debate in the community about whether the tax burden should be shouldered primarily by rich countries," Mr Zoellick said. The Bank had been a vocal proponent of the levy, but Mr Zoellick, who was reappointed to his position this year, says that while the view on this was "not universal" inside the bank, it was now becoming less so. "In the past, the development community has been pretty anti-dividend [tax] but, I think now, there is more balance, and there are countries that have adopted dividend taxation that are doing well," he said. Advertisement "It is not only about the rich countries." Speaking at the World Bank's latest annual meeting in Indonesia, Mr Zoellick said that it was an "easy thing" for countries with low to moderate income to impose higher levies on the rich in their economies. "So it would seem to me, if you have low or moderate income countries, that it would make sense to start with high-income countries," he said. "But I think it's a fallacy to think that you can reduce the tax burden on the rich by raising the tax burden on the poor." The World Bank's recent findings have also dealt a blow to the "war on terror" just as countries are looking to tighten their borders after the 11 September attacks in the US, he said. "We find that there are several countries which are increasing their border security at the same time that the tax burden on their citizens is being cut back," Mr Zoellick said. "Some of these are oil-producing countries. To some extent, these countries are going to
